

Participant Biographies

Stephanie Barrientos is a Senior Lecturer in the Institute of Development Policy and Management and Associate Director of the Brooks World Poverty Institute at The University of Manchester. She has researched and published widely on gender, global production, employment, decent work, trade and labor standards, corporate social responsibility, fair trade, and ethical trade.

Mary Borrowman is Ph.D. candidate in the Economics Department of the New School for Social Research and has an M.A. in Economics from the University of Utah. Her research focuses on international trade, global value chains, trade policy and the gendered effects of globalization. She serves as a Research Assistant for the project "Capturing the Gains from Globalization."

Tim Büthe is Associate Professor of Political Science at Duke University and a Senior Fellow for Rethinking Regulation at Duke's Kenan Institute for Ethics. His research focuses on how institutions not only constrain but also empower actors, especially in what he has called global private politics, the transnational rule-making for global markets, and on the international dimension of antitrust/competition policy.

Michelle Christian is a postdoctoral research scholar with the Center on Globalization, Governance, and Competitiveness (CGGC) in the Social Science Research Institute (SSRI) at Duke University. From 2010-2013 she was one of the tourism research coordinators for Capturing the Gains (CtG). Michelle has conducted tourism global field research in multiple locations in Uganda, Kenya, and Costa Rica with an emphasis on how gender, race, and category of worker statuses intersect with global production network and value chain formations. In fall 2013 she will join the Department of Sociology at the University of Tennessee as an Assistant Professor.

Gary Gereffi is Professor of Sociology and Director of the Center on Globalization, Governance, & Competitiveness at Duke University. He has recently completed a 3-year project on economic and social upgrading in global value chains, financed by the UK's Department for International Development and he is currently working on global value chains in emerging economies and new methodologies for measuring value chain upgrading.

Peter Knorringa is Professor of Private Sector & Development at the Institute of Social Studies, Erasmus University Rotterdam, The Netherlands. His past research has focused on small and medium scale enterprises in developing countries, operating in clusters and value chains. His present research agenda also includes private governance, labour standards and frugal innovation. He leads the ISS

Research Initiative on Civic Innovation, coordinates a new Leiden-Delft-Erasmus research program on 'Innovation and Technology Networks with Africa', and participates in an ESRC funded research program on: 'Rising Powers, Labour Standards and the Governance of Global Production Networks'.

Anirudh Krishna is Professor of Public Policy and Political Science at Duke University. His research investigates how poor communities and individuals in developing countries cope with the structural and personal constraints that result in poverty and powerlessness. Recent research projects have examined poverty dynamics at the household level for 35,000 households in India, Kenya, Uganda, Peru, and North Carolina, examining both how people escaped poverty – and more important, how some came to be poor in the first place. Current research concerns include social mobility, spatial inequality, and urban slums. Before returning to academia, Krishna spent 14 years with the Indian Administrative Service, managing diverse rural and urban development initiatives.

Frederick "Fritz" Mayer is Associate Professor of Public Policy and Political Science at the Sanford School of Public Policy at Duke University, and Director of the Duke Program on Global Policy and Governance, a summer program for professional graduate students in Geneva, Switzerland. Mayer's research focuses on the political economy of international policy and governance, particularly related to international trade and climate change.

William Milberg is Professor of Economics at the New School for Social Research. His research focuses on the relation between globalization and income distribution, and the history and philosophy of economics. He serves on the Research Coordinating Committee for the project "Capturing the Gains from Globalization," and has worked as a consultant to the UNDP, the ILO, the UNCTAD and the World Bank.

Layna Mosley is Professor of Political Science at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Her research interests are in the fields of comparative and international political economy, with a focus on how global capital markets and production processes affect national level outcomes, such as workers' rights and fiscal policies.

Dev Nathan is Professor at the Institute for Human Development, New Delhi and Visiting Research Fellow at CGGC, Duke University.

Nicola Phillips is Professor of Political Economy at the University of Sheffield. She currently holds a three-year Major Research Fellowship from the Leverhulme Trust, which funds her research on forced labour and human trafficking for labour exploitation in the contemporary global economy. Her wider interests cluster around the study of global political economy, development and governance.

John Pickles is the Earl N Phillips Distinguished Professor of International Studies and Chair of the Department of Geography at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He serves on the University of North Carolina Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Labor and Licensing and as the research coordinator for the Apparel Sector Research Group of the Capturing the Gains Network. His current research deals with the changing dynamics in apparel global value chains and their effects on the geographies of production and employment in different regions; post-socialist economies and the integration of Central and East European countries into the EU; and migration routes and border management in Euro-Med.

Anne Posthuma is the Senior Specialist for Employment and Labour Market Policies in the ILO Office in Brazil. Her current work focuses upon the role of labour market policies (including minimum wages, formalization of employment and promotion of international labour standards) and the implications for vocational training, SME development and youth employment in Brazil.

Meenu Tewari is Associate Professor of Economic Development in the Department of City and Regional Planning at UNC Chapel Hill. She is interested in the political economy of development, local industrialization, skill formation and upgrading within regional and global production networks. Her work focuses comparatively on developed and developing countries. She is currently completing research on place based corporate social responsibility initiatives and regional production networks in India supported by the Capturing the Gains Initiative and the Asian Development Bank.

Giovanni Zanalda is an assistant research professor in the SSRI, the Department of Economics, and the Department of History at Duke University. He is also affiliated to the Sanford School of Public Policy. He is an economic historian specialized in the history of the international economy, financial history, and history of globalization from the sixteenth century to the present. At Duke he teaches courses on financial crises, emerging markets, international economy 1850-to the present, and on the history of globalization with a particular emphasis on trade and cultural exchanges. He has been consultant in the Chief Economist Office of the World Bank, the Italian Delegation at the OECD (Financial Unit), and conducted research in various European countries, the United States, Argentina, Africa and Asia.
